In the fold of my hands

It is in the fold of my hand,
I see the world shrink to dust.
The strains on the cold flesh of my palms pulverises breaths to fumes, clouds torn apart to foster rain of insanity.

The seeds that
wrapped up the sunlight, moulds me into earthen pots carrying memories dried up in the sun.

The moist air garnishes my neck, beading pearls of sweat.
The tales I weave out of lifeless nights surrenders the land to darkness, sickening and maddening the souls.
 I see the land crumble to ash.

In your eyes

In the blink of your eyes, I see a part of me manifest and stolen forever.

My heart with its apprehensions sleeps with a million dreams awake; the stories your eyes hold for me consummates the orphaned clouds that loiter in the sky, heralding the onset of a spring anew .

In our unison, the withered leaves usher a new lease of life.

In the clamour of your heart, I wake from my slumber, envisioning the fruits of passion which our eyes behold in communion.
